

James Jackson, 96th Infantry Division WWII

We could say quite truthfully that war is extremely wasteful and an ill-conceived manner of solving mankind's problems: and we would be right. We could also be justified in defending our country and our way of life and history would also prove that too would be right.

But the consequence of this enormity is the suffering of those at home. Each death has profound and sad effect on a plethora of loved ones; parents, siblings, wives, children, sweethearts and generations yet to be.
